And as it was that morning, so was it ever increwards. Apart from her father the curate always found her bright and cheerful, though perhaps, less given to mirth than most girls of twenty; but with the parting on always subdued, always duted by whing himbrith eager anticipation of his wishes or wants; reading when she was bidden—he would have her read aloud for hours some days; sineing to him if he was so disposed; his lowing summer; "and that means," thought Geodrap, receiving, that I shall be wanted here no longer." That day the curate first faced a very awkward question: "Would Mr. Darlington with all his seeming friend-liness, be disposed to give up his daughter to a man who had no better prospect for years to come, than a curacy, or possibly a country grammar-rechool—who had no prospect, moreover, of ever inheriting more than the softery thousand pounds he already poissesed?"

The poor fellow took himself to task for his folly, but it was late in the day to do that. Then he teld bimself he must see and there, but half a dezen candles were fiaring in a strong draugut, the window stood wide open. While he hesitated, a voice without said:

"Mr. Bree, is papa coming? What, are you going already?" Then she stepped in, with a dark shawl gathered about her head and shoulders; but though she closed the window she kept well in the shadow of the curtains, holding up one hand to shield her eyes, as though the light dazzled her.

"Wait one moment" she said softly, as he offered to hid her good night; then going on ing summer; "and that means," thought

The poor fellow took himself to task for his folly; but it was late in the day to do that. Then he told bimself he must see and master the quick-growing passion—which only shows how ignorant he was on such matters; and then, as if the very Fates fought against bim, fir. Darlington met with some sine to the content of the partial of the stight accident which kept him within-doors and he was constantly sending for the curate to dine or lanch with him, "out of pity." So the chains were riveted faster than ever as winter drew on apace.

IH .- IN WORSE CONFUSION. One November afternoon an urgent message had gone across to the rectory for Mr. Bree to dine at the White House; so Mr. Darlington's cottage was called.

Mr. Bree had declined to go, half glad to be out of danger's way for once—"his lads were coming up to the night school, and he should be busy until eight o'clock." Upon which came another message that Mr. Dar-lington would put off dining till eight if Mr. Bree would go then. So the over persuaded on the gave in, and went something sgaiost ly the time dragged along, each day opening on the hope that he might meet Miss Dar-his mind what course he ought to take; and next, because his more frequents sill appear to the course his more frequents sill appear to the course his more frequents sill up to work for her neighbors. One strengthened his liking for that gentleman. At times such fisches of bitterness broke from him, such rough, harsh speeches, as made one wonder what in the world was out of joint with this man, who lived to all seeming in such weelth and comfort; and after such speeches, if they had happened at dinner, it was certain Mr. Darlington attempted to raise his spirits by diaking freely it seemed as though she must have sunt here is seemed as though she must have sunt here. It is seemed as though she must have sunt here is seemed as though she must have sunt here in the comfort in the curst for her neighbors. One day an old paralyzed woman, whose home Emily had often brightened by her presence, told the curate "that her young lady was a goin' right away; she come last should miss her, that she should!" and then the poor old creature ahed ready tears, and pitted herself for being about to lose so kind a friend.

After that Godfrey heard the coming de-another sneer.

"Teaching is 'my line,' as you say," he answered: "and I like it heartily. Perhaps you will excuse me for saying that I consider it as much my duty to teach the lads about here what little they are anxious to learn as I should consider it my duty to falfill any other trust committed to me honestly and fairly."

"Bah! trust!" muttered Mr. Darlington and again the curate caught the daughter's eye, glancing nervously toward him as though imploring a change of conversation. So, striking farther afield for a subject, he went

"I had a pupit once, five or six years ago for whose sake I used often to wish myself a for whose sale? used often to wish myself a rich man, so that I could have pushed him on in the world. For so young a boy, he promised wonderfully well, and many a plan we made to work him up and get him through Oxford or Cambridge. But it all came to nothing: downright poverty forced his mother to take him from school. Somehow a berth was found for him in a ship that traded between here and China—he hated the sea, poor little chap! And the other day I took up a stray newspaper for a minute, and the first thing I saw was that the "Queen" had gone down in the Chinese seas with poor Charlie Merlin and every other soul on board."

"Charlie!"-it was Miss Darlington began speaking. Her father interrupted her harshly: "Ring the bell! I—this glass is snapped;" and "Ring the bell! I—this glass is snapped;" and he pushed the broken glass away. "You need not remain, Emily; we shall be in the draw-ing-room presently;" but his voice as he spoke was unsteady, and his band abook terribly as he poured out more wine.

Miss Darlington hurried from the room without a word; but as Godfrey held the door open for her, he could see that he face out of Clayton county. without a word; but as Godfrey held the dive attract from the door open for her, he could see that her face our of Claytan cou my.

Meanwhile, as his acquaintance with the Daslingtons grow closer, the weeks were creeping on. The harvest was gathered in far and near, and the woods down the steep hill sides were glorious in red and golder gardents. The steep hill sides were glorious in red and golder tetters from abroad told Godfrey Bree that Mr. Herbert, the rector, was slowly but surely regaining his health, and trusted to be able to the state of the state o

"Wait one moment." she said softly, as he offered to hid her good night; then going on rapidly, a deep flush replacing her unusual pallor, "Will you forgive me, Mr. Bree; but will you—may I give you semething for that poor lady you spoke of? papa gives me so much more than I ever use." The last words broke into something very like a sob. "Please go," she whispered; "and pray do not name who sent this."

He could but go, more puzzled than ever, by the evening visit. "This" he found on examination, to be a bank note for fifty pounds.

IV.-PRUDENCE GOES TO THE WIND the strange circumstances of his last visit to the White House—last it seemed likely to be, for no invitation to go again reached him between that night and Christmas, and wear! curve gave in, and went something sgaiost his will.

A warrant was used for the arrest of the young man, who is a fore a brief period sat in Parliament, but it was suddenly announced that he had died of fever. A few days later particulars of his funeral were given, at which the present Duke was chief mourner. But somehow considerable incredulity existed in many quarters as to Lord Arthur's death, inasmuch shat event seemed to be so amszingly opportune, and an advertis ment—"they all looked very jolly in their mourning clothes", which speared not long after in the eagony" column of the Times, connected itself, in many minds, with his Lordahips obsequies, and was accepted as his of the Association. The President, Secretary and two members of the Knewlyton dense of the Association, with the surel had been duly performed. Just lately this impression has gathered strength by a strange rumor which is current in London. the evidence preserved.

THE EVISION AND THE POR MONTH.

After waiting untiring until after ten o'clock, the Solicitor General moved the court to postpone the trial until next Monday morning at ten o'clock. The motion was based upon two grounds—first, the absence of the shirt-band reporter, and second, the fact that it would be impossible to conclude the investigation in one day, which would throw a part of the trial over to next week. General Gar behalf of the defense, stated that they were ready for trial, but as a courtesy to the State would not pres it, and were willing to acquiesce in the postpor ment. The Court then announced the trial would be set for o'clockinext Monday morning and adjourned. The prisoner consulted a few moments with his counsel,

Funeral of Ponn Bedell.

The funeral of Mr. Penn Bedell took place pur apact to announcement at three o'clock yeste afternoon at the First Presbyterian Church. The in-terior of the church was packed to overflowing by the friends and acquaintances of the deceased, and a large number were unable to procure admittance and were compelled to remain on the streets. Both sides of Marietta street for some distance above and below the church were lined with spectators. Besides the relatives and friends of Bedeil, his company, the Atlanta Zonaves were out in force, also detachments from the onesboro Zonsves, the Atlanta Cadets and the Governor's Guards, making together a most imposing dis play. The services in the Church and at the grave were read by the Rev. George McCauley. He made a few remarks about the deceased, and alluded to his virtues. No formal sermon was preached. The choir sang several beautiful pieces.

The procession moved from the church as follows: The Zonaves in front, with reversed arms; the hearst; the delegation of Jonesboro Zonave; the detachment of the Governor's Guards: the detachm Cadets; and the vehicles, of which there was a larre number. The remains of Bedell were buried in the Comfederate cemetery. After the body had been placed the grave the Zonaves fired the usual military

I am but a private citizen, never having sought or held any political office here, or elsewhere, whether Federal, State, or Municipal. The occasion of this compliment is therefore due to the efforts and energies I expended among you to build up the State, stimulate her enterprise, and awaken her peo-ple into an appreciation of the wast and boundless resources and wealth by which they are surrounded. It is a tribute to the energy and enterprise of what you express so well in the plain but glorious and comprehensive word, a Workingman. In your kind ness and generosity overlooking the failure of the in-dividual to honor the principle.

Had you honored me with your suffrages for Chief Magistrate of your noble Commonwealth, I could not have esteemed it higher than I do to be addressed as the person embracing that energy and enterprise which you honor.
